"The next (in the catacomb under the farm of Tor Marancia near Rome) was a graphite, one of those rude scratchings which, though made by idle or mischievous hands, prompted by the spirit which has moved the 'cockneys' of all ages to disfigure walls by recording their names or fancies upon them, nevertheless often contain most valuable information. This graphite was found on the intonaco (plaster) of the apse. It represented in rude outline the profile of a bishop seated, evidently preaching from the episcopal chair, with a kind of background showing the side of the choir, with the pulpit or ambo for the epistle. It was clearly a reminiscence of an event which had occurred within the basilica. Here, again, conjecture could only offer an explanation; but what event could the representation of a pontiff preaching in a basilica within the catacomb believed to be that of Domitilla suggest other than the sainted Gregory delivering that homily he is recorded to have preached to the people in the cemetery where the saints Nereus and Achilleus were buried, and which tradition has connected with the church dedicated to them within the walls!"—Shakespeare Wood. [Gr. graphō.]

GRAVITATION, grav-i-tā'shun, n. the act of gravitating or tending to a centre of attraction: the force by which bodies are pressed or drawn, or by which they tend toward the centre of the earth or other centre, or the effect of that force. The attraction of gravitation exists between bodies in the mass, and acts at sensible distances. It is thus distinguished from chemical and cohesive attractions, which unite the particles of bodies together, and act at insensible distances, or distances too small to be measured.—TERRESTRIAL GRAVITATION, gravitation which respects the earth, or by which bodies descend or tend towards the centre of the earth. All bodies, when unsupported, fall by gravitation towards the earth in straight lines tending to its centre.—GENERAL or UNIVERSAL GRAVITATION, gravitation by which all the planets tend towards one another, and by which all the bodies and particles of matter in the universe tend towards one another. The theory of universal gravitation was established by Sir Isaac Newton, who laid down the law that every particle of matter within the universe attracts every other particle with a force proportional directly to the product of the numbers representing their mass, and inversely to the square of the distance separating one from the other.

GRAVITY, grav'i-ti, n. weightiness: the tendency of matter to attract and be attracted, thus causing weight: state of being grave or sober: relative importance: (mus.) lowness of a note.—ABSOLUTE GRAVITY, that by which a body descends freely and perpendicularly in a vacuum or non-resisting medium.—RELATIVE GRAVITY, that by which a body descends when the absolute gravity is constantly counteracted by a uniform but inferior force, such as in the descent of bodies down inclined planes, or in resisting mediums, as air and water.—SPECIFIC GRAVITY, the weight belonging to an equal bulk of every different substance: the relative gravity or weight of any body or substance considered with regard to the weight of an equal bulk of some other body which is assumed as a standard of comparison. The standard for the specific gravities of solids and liquids is pure distilled water at the temperature of 62° Fahr., which is reckoned unity, and by comparing the weights of equal bulks of other bodies with this standard we obtain their specific gravities. Thus, if we take equal bulks of water, silver, and platinum, and weigh them, the silver will be found to be 10·5 times and the platinum 21·4 times heavier than the water; and reckoning the specific gravity of water unity, the specific gravity of silver is said to be 10·5 and that of platinum 21·4. The practical rule is, weigh the body in air, then in pure distilled water, and the weight in air divided by the loss of weight in water will give the specific gravity of the body. One substance is said to have a greater specific gravity than another when a given bulk of the former weighs more than the same bulk of the latter. In designating the specific gravities of gases the standard or unity is atmospheric air. [Fr. gravité—L. gravitas—gravis, heavy.]

Besides true sexual reproduction, and besides the power of producing colonies by continuous budding, fresh individuals are in many cases produced by a process of discontinuous gemmation. The Polyzoa are chiefly marine, encrusting stones, old shells, and sea-weeds; but some are fresh-water.

In mild cases the glands, after having suppurated, slowly heal; in others, the eyes and eyelids become inflamed, the joints become affected, the disease gradually extending to the ligaments and bones, and producing a hectic and debilitated state under which the patient sinks; or it ends in tuberculated lungs and pulmonary consumption. Under the Federal Constitution the law of search-warrant requires that the property sought and the place to be entered and searched must be specifically described. Before 1776, Writs of Assistance were issued by royal order in the Colonies, giving officers of the crown the power to search and invade the homes of the people in very indiscriminate and outrageous fashion. The reaction against such tyrannical invasion of privacy gave us our present well-hedged law, under which the homes of citizens may not be so invaded, and search-warrants may not issue without probable cause, indemnity bond in civil cases, and a specific description of the place and the property involved in the process.

Its origin and nature are still imperfectly known. It usually attacks those persons who are unaccustomed to a seafaring life, but persons so accustomed do not always escape. It may attack the strong and cautious, while the debilitated and incautious may go free. It may attack on smooth waters, while a rough sea may fail to produce it. It may pass away after the lapse of a few hours, or last during a whole voyage. One good authority explains it as an undue accumulation of the blood in the nervous centres along the back, and especially in those segments of the spinal cord related to the stomach and the muscles concerned in vomiting, and recommends as the best remedy against it the application of ice-bags to the spinal column. In some cases its violence may be considerably mitigated by iced brandy, by small doses of opium, by soda-water, or by saline draughts in the effervescent state.
